Disadvantages of render

Rendering is popular because of its durability and attractive appearance, however, it is not immune to damage and can crack and blister quite easily.

Why does render need repairing?

Overtime the build up of water and the cyclical temperature changes will cause small cracks to turn into major problems which are both costly and difficult to fix.

However most common cause of cracking and bulging, however, tends to be frost action on moisture trapped between the render and the wall. This is why small hairline cracks should be sealed when they first develop, otherwise water penetrating through can freeze and expand, blowing the render surface loose – resulting in even larger cracks. Cracking due to shrinkage can also develop where the original render mix was too strong.

Why is it important to repair render?

As soon as you notice a crack in your rendering, however small, you should make a point of getting it fixed as quickly as possible. The smallest of cracks in the render will allow water to seep into the underlying structure and will eventually cause damage.
